Maxie L. Patterson worked with his father, Harry Patterson, Sr., at the Ford Motor Company while attending Ferris State College. He was offered a foreman position, but turned it down after watching his father's health fail. When his father died, Patterson left school, and joined the U.S. Army as a counterintelligence officer. He trained in Baltimore, Maryland, where he learned typing and interrogation techniques; and in El Paso, Texas, where he learned to speak Vietnamese. Prior to his deployment, Patterson visited Jack Sible, his Ferris State College counselor, who had joined the staff of Michigan State University. Sible encouraged Patterson to apply, and he was admitted with deferred enrollment. In Vietnam, Patterson worked on the Phoenix Program, which targeted the Vietcong's organizational infrastructure. After returning in 1970, he studied public administration at Michigan State University, and befriended university president Clifton R. Wharton, Jr. while working on the university's police force.

Maxie L. Patterson managed the pension funds for the City of Houston, Texas. In the late 1990s, he decided not to invest in the Enron Corporation, which collapsed a few years later. Patterson went on to become the executive director of the Texas Association of Public Employee Retirement Systems, where he organized workshops and lobbied for legislation. Patterson was active in the community of Houston, where he served as vice president of his region of the Episcopal Church, directed the damage assessment program at the American Red Cross and officiated football games for the Southwestern Athletic Conference and the local high schools. Patterson also joined the Texas Master Chorale; and, at the time of the interview, was planning a tour of Italy with the group. He received numerous awards, including the Army Commendation Metal for his service in the Vietnam War. Patterson also describes how he would like to be remembered and his advice to future generations, and narrates his photographs.
