Biographical Note by The HistoryMakers®

Theresa Fambro Hooks was an award winning columnist and photographer for The Chicago Defender. Born May 5, 1935 in Chicago, Illinois, Hooks graduated from Parker (now Robeson) High School in 1953 and went on to attend the University of Illinois, Roosevelt University and the School of the Art Institute of Chicago in their Fashion Design Department.

Joining The Chicago Daily Defender in 1961, Hooks served as woman's editor and society columnist and published articles in the daily pages about social and community events, food and fashions. She also wrote an advice column as "Arletta Claire" and a column called "Social Whirl," later renamed "TeeSee's Town." In "TeeSee's Town," Hooks covered the "good news" in the community including art, theatre, culture and the movement of Chicago's business, corporate, community and social leaders. Her other professional positions included manager of community/public affairs for Philco-Ford's Chicago Residential Manpower Center and special assistant to the president of Olive Harvey College for public information. As president of Theresa Fambro Hooks and Associates, she provided public relations, communications and marketing services for ETA Creative Arts Foundation, National Newspaper Publishers Association, the Abraham Lincoln Center, The Woodlawn Organization, among others.

Hooks was active with the Girl Scouts, various YWCAs, the Westside Association of Community Action (WACA), Midwest Sickle Cell Association, West Chesterfield Garden Club, and Adoption Information Services. She was national president of the National Association of Media Women and received the Phenomenal Woman Award at V-103's Expo for Today's Black Woman, the Lifetime Achievement Award from the Black Public Relations Society, the Russ Ewing Legacy Award of Excellence, Outstanding Journalist from the Chicago Association of Black Journalists, and The Fashion Connection Award. Hooks was a member of Christ United Methodist Church.

Hooks was interviewed by The HistoryMakers on December 16, 2009.

Hooks passed away on January 31, 2016.

Video Oral History Interview with Theresa Fambro Hooks, Section A2009_145_001_001, TRT: 0:31:27 ?

Theresa Fambro Hooks was born on May 5, 1935 in Chicago, Illinois to Lois Davenport Fambro and Lemage Fambro, Jr. Her paternal grandfather was a printer and landowner in Madison, Georgia, where her father was born in 1906. His family later moved to Chicago, where he graduated from McKinley High School. Hooks' mother was born in 1907 on her family's farm in Carlton, Georgia. She attended the Union Baptist Institute in Athens, Georgia, and graduated in 1930 from Spelman College in Atlanta, Georgia. Hooks' parents met in Chicago while dancing at The Peps, a venue on the South Side. Her father worked for the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and later operated a print shop from their home in Chicago's Woodlawn neighborhood, where Hooks grew up. Her mother belonged to the Olivet Baptist Church and the Chicago Northern District Association of Club Women, and they were friends of the owners of the A.A. Rayner & Sons Funeral Home. Hooks attended St. Anselm's School and Parker High School.

Theresa Fambro Hooks began her career as a society journalist in 1961 at the Chicago Defender, a black newspaper in Chicago, Illinois. For her column, Teesee's Town, she covered the activities and exclusive events of social clubs like the Green Donkeys, the Royalites, the Royal Coterie of Snakes and the Original 40 Club. She also attended fundraisers hosted by service organizations like The Links and the Alpha Kappa Alpha Sorority. In addition, Hooks documented the annual galas of the eta Creative Arts Foundation and the Chicago Sinfonietta, as well as President Barack Obama's inauguration. She went on to found Theresa Fambro Hooks and Associates, a public relations firm that organized events for nonprofit organizations in the Chicago area. Hooks remembers her colleagues, photographers Theodore Bell and Tony Rhoden. She also recalls instances when socialites were offended by her articles, and talks about gossip columns like the Chicago Crusader's Tell It Like It Is.

Theresa Fambro Hooks served for over forty years as a society journalist for the Chicago Defender, where her column, Teesee's Town, covered the activities of local organizations in Chicago, Illinois. She eventually left the newspaper to work elsewhere in Chicago, including with the Philco Ford Corporation and Parker House Sausage Company, until Chicago Defender executive Fred Sengstacke requested that she return. Later, Hooks left to found a public relations firm called Theresa Fambro Hooks and Associates. When the newspaper ownership changed in the early 2000s, attorney Jerome Butler and publisher Colonel Eugene Scott invited her to return, and she obliged. Hooks remembers her involvement in Harold Washington's mayoral campaign, and the Chicago Defender's response to the assassination of Reverend Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. She reflects upon her career at the Chicago Defender and how she would like to be remembered. She also describes her writing style, and talks about her family and friends.
