Video Oral History Interview with Andrea Zopp, Section A2012_006_001_001, TRT: 1:31:16 ?

Andrea Zopp was born on January 25, 1957 in Rochester, New York to Pearl Hurst Davis and Reuben K. Davis. Zopp's maternal great-grandfather, William Henry Hurst, Jr., owned a general store in Suffolk, Virginia, which served the local African American community. He and his wife, Annie Amons Hurst, raised Zopp's mother after the death of her father, Lemuel Hurst. Zopp's paternal great-grandfather was born a slave, and became emancipated at nine years old. Her father was born in Columbia, Mississippi, and moved as a teenager to Chicago, Illinois, where he enrolled at Englewood High School. He served in the U.S. Army during World War II, and went on to attend Virginia State College for Negroes and Boston University School of Law. After graduating, he moved to New York City, where he met Zopp's mother, who was a graduate of Hampton Institute. Later, the couple reconnected and married in Rochester, New York. There, they raised Zopp and her brother, Mark Davis, in a predominantly white neighborhood.

Andrea Zopp began her education at Academy of the Sacred Heart, an all girl Catholic school in Rochester, New York. When her family moved to the Cobbs Hill neighborhood, Zopp transferred to Martin B. Anderson School No. 1. Zopp was then granted admission to Our Lady of Mercy High School for Young Girls, where her mother, Pearl Hurst Davis, worked. Zopp's father, Reuben K. Davis, was a prominent civil rights lawyer, who worked in private practice with Zopp's maternal great-uncle, Lloyd Hurst. He became the first African American Rochester city court judge, and was appointed to the Appellate Division 4th Judicial Department of the Supreme Court of the State of New York. Zopp was a National Merit Scholar, and her extracurricular activities included community service work with Jack and Jill of America. Upon graduating in 1974, she attended Harvard University in Cambridge, Massachusetts, where Massachusetts Governor Deval L. Patrick was her classmate.

Andrea Zopp initially struggled socially at Harvard University in Cambridge, Massachusetts. During her freshman year, Zopp was the only African American student assigned all white roommates. In an effort to connect with her African American classmates, Zopp joined the Kuumba Singers of Harvard College and a black theatre group on campus. Zopp studied history and science, and took courses in Afro-American Studies with Professor Ewart Guinier. In the summer of 1973, Zopp worked in the Washington, D.C. offices of Congressman Frank Horton, which inspired her to become a lawyer. Upon graduating in 1978, Zopp matriculated at Harvard Law School, where she was taught by Archibald Cox, Criminal Law Professor Charles Nesson and Derrick A. Bell, Jr., who was the school's first African American professor to receive tenure. She recalls the violent protests against the desegregation of schools in Boston, Massachusetts, and the subsequent attempts to bus African American children to white schools.

Andrea Zopp met film producer Debra Martin Chase and Circuit Court Judge Joseph A. Greenaway, Jr., while studying at the Harvard Law School in Cambridge, Massachusetts. After graduation, she was encouraged to apply for judicial clerkships, and was hired by Illinois Judge George N. Leighton. She moved to Chicago, Illinois, where she met her father's cousin, Judge Earl Strayhorn. As a clerk in Judge George N. Leighton's court, she witnessed the proceedings of the Bee Gees' copyright infringement case. After two years there, Zopp decided to become a prosecutor, and sought employment at the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Northern District of Illinois, where she worked for seven years under Judge Ann Claire Williams. She remembers Chicago politicians like Harold Washington, Edward Vrdolyak and Edward M. Burke. Zopp also talks several corruption investigations in Chicago, which resulted in the indictment of prominent lawyers, judges and African American aldermen.
